

1.5.2 Small-group tactics

Small-group tactics are used with a minimum of two players in conjunction with the individual tactics and core concepts they possess, the aim being to achieve a common tactical objective (this objective will be formed according to the general principles of game play). Small-group tactics represent the halfway point between individual and group tactics, and are based on the former as a means of improving and facilitating the latter. Options for teamwork amongst various players, in attacking as well as defensive areas, will be referred to as small-group technical/tactical options. Small-group technical/tactical options are categorised as follows:

Classification based on J.L. Antón (1998).

In the following section, all of the small-group technical/tactical options are categorised, with attacking concepts listed separately to defensive ones. The most important features of each type of play will be discussed further in the sections below:
