

Technical/tactical attacking options for two players

1

Playing in pairs

2

Back-door cut with player on the ball reading the play and playing a pass

1.5.2.1 Small-group technical/tactical attacking options

Technical/tactical attacking options for two players

This is a means for two players to work in tandem; it covers the majority of options discussed in the following sections, as well as numerous other forms of game play.

One-two

A player passes to the supporting team-mate and then runs off the ball into space behind the marker to receive the ball back from the supporting player. This option is normally used in 2v2 situations to create a 2v1, by drawing a defender away from their zone.

Overlap

This is where two team-mates cross over. An attacker goes on a bending run from their position around the player in possession, aiming to receive the ball or cause confusion in the defence at the moment of the crossover. This confusion can then be exploited by the player on the ball.

Parallel move

An attacker runs off the ball (not necessarily after a pass) into the space behind the defender marking the player in possession, in order to receive a pass. This is known as a parallel run because it is normally made when the ball is on the wing and the player making the move off the ball receives the pass down the line.

3

One-two

4

Overlap

5

Parallel move

