

Going wide to create a 'false' pivot

Attacking triangles (passing triangles)

Attacking triangles (one-twos)

Decoy run to free up or create a passing angle

Movement off the ball in order to free up space or create a potential passing angle is a technical/tactical option for three-player combinations.

Dragging defenders away

Although this move can be executed by one player in a 1v1, it can also be employed by up to three players. Space is created by separating and breaking up the defensive cover, thereby enabling successful 1v1 situations to be created, provided that the players running off the ball do so in a direction away from the 1v1 situation.

Three players dragging defenders away

Two options in breaking past the defender in a 1v1 when the defender is not being covered by one of their team-mates.

Three-player moves: parallel and diagonal moves

Attacking triangles

Generally speaking, the aim of having players form triangles, with the ball on one corner of the triangle, is to create a situation that enables the player in possession to receive support at all times, with various passing angles being created. This prevents the defence from pressing the ball.

Three-player attack

Any passing move involving three players, regardless of their movement or positions. For example, players making parallel and diagonal runs off the ball, with a pass then being made to one of the two options.

Elementary small-group technical/tactical options for three players

Outnumbering the opposition in a 3vGK (unlikely), 3v1, or 3v2. As with numerical advantages with two players, players must attack with speed and accuracy to take advantage and score.

Basic technical/tactical options for three players in an attacking transition situation

Although a 3v3 is more complex than a 2v2 transition, as an equal-sided situation offering many small-group options for slowing the attacking transition down in a defensive sense, it also gives attackers, who are looking to take advantage of the transition, the chance to create opportunities for finishing on goal quickly.